Chapter 1: The Beginning

The small settlement of Brookfield lay in the valley between two low hills. It had been founded by farmers who wanted good soil and clean water, and for many years it had both. The first houses were built of timber and stone, and the settlers cleared the land around them for fields and gardens.

By the time the census was taken in 1850, Brookfield had grown to a population of three hundred and forty-two people. There were two churches, a school, a mill, and a blacksmith's shop. The main street was unpaved and muddy in winter, but it was lined with trees that gave shade in summer.

The Mill

The mill was the heart of the village. It stood on the stream that ran through the valley, and its wheel turned day and night. The miller, Thomas Hargreaves, was a man of few words but great strength. He could lift a sack of grain that two ordinary men struggled with.

Hargreaves had built the mill himself in 1832, after the previous one burned down. He had learned the trade from his father, who had learned it from his father before him. The mill was not just a business; it was a family tradition that stretched back three generations.

Grinding Grain

The process of grinding grain was simple but required skill. The miller had to judge the moisture of the grain, the speed of the stones, and the fineness of the flour. Too fast and the flour was coarse; too slow and the mill could not keep up with the demand.

Hargreaves kept a record of every sack he ground. He noted the weight, the type of grain, and the name of the farmer who brought it. This book was his most valuable possession, more important than the mill itself.

Water Power

The stream that powered the mill was fed by springs in the hills above the village. In dry summers it ran low, and the miller had to wait for rain before he could grind. In winter it sometimes froze, and the wheel stood still for days at a time.

The Church

The parish church was built of local stone and could hold about two hundred people. The vicar, Reverend Samuel Whitfield, preached every Sunday and also visited the sick and the poor. He was well liked by most of his parishioners, though a few thought him too strict.

The church had a small graveyard behind it, where many of the early settlers were buried. Their headstones were simple, with only a name and a date. Some of the oldest stones had begun to lean and were slowly sinking into the ground.

The School

The school had one room and one teacher, Miss Elizabeth Crane. She taught reading, writing, and arithmetic to about thirty children of different ages. The older children helped the younger ones, and Miss Crane moved between them as needed.

Attendance was not compulsory, and many children worked on their families' farms during the busy seasons. Miss Crane kept a register of who came and when, and she noted the reasons for absence. She was patient with those who had to stay home to help.

Chapter 2: Trade and Travel

Brookfield was not entirely cut off from the world. A road connected it to the market town of Greenhill, about twelve miles away. Carts and wagons passed through regularly, carrying goods in both directions. The journey took most of a day.

The main exports were grain, wool, and timber. The main imports were salt, iron, and cloth. The blacksmith made and repaired tools for the farmers, and he also shod the horses that pulled the carts.

The Road

The road was maintained by the parish, which meant that it was rarely in good condition. After heavy rain it was deep in mud, and after dry weather it was full of ruts. The carters complained about it, but nothing was done.

In 1847 a group of farmers proposed to improve the road by laying gravel on the worst sections. The proposal was discussed at a parish meeting but was voted down. The cost was thought too high, and the benefit too uncertain.

The Market

The market in Greenhill was held every Tuesday. Farmers from Brookfield and the surrounding villages brought their produce to sell. The market was busy from dawn to dusk, and the inns did a good trade.

Hargreaves went to the market every week with a cart of flour. He had a regular customer in the baker, Mrs. Dorothy Pennington, who bought a large quantity each time. She was one of the few people who could afford to buy flour rather than grind her own grain.
